

DETR

Attention to detail frequently dictates success or failure in the design or refurbishment of a building. Even more so when it's a Ministry building of a Government with a modernising image.

When Eland House, busy London home of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR) was refurbished recently, the hundreds of Modulex signs used throughout the building reflected that image on all 10-storeys. At the same time, overcoming the directional complexities endemic in any busy government building.

The gently curved profile of the Panorama range is the ideal accommodation for the Department's own paper text, ensuring clarity whilst name and location changes can be made quickly and within budget.

Main directories in the lift lobbies are A3, with A4 widely used on office doors, emergency exits and washrooms, whilst A1 and even larger are used for publicity and project presentation material.

A spokesperson for EPR Design, lead design practice on the fit out, commented:

Not only was Modulex price competitive, but Panorama allowed for the flexibility of a paper-based programme, whilst looking good. We subsequently chose Modulex for a Charities Commission project and, again, were pleased with the service we received.
